Background

The horticultural sciences deal with a number of important crops grown in the vegetable world, from the known beans, soybeans, stone fruit, watermelon, and tomato to the unknown. A search for exchanging knowledge and experiences is very promising in今天most diverse crop industries in India. By this, the need of the hour is a total food production system. The food science scenario currently makes more than 35% of the total agricultural GDP (India). Though a few are the traditional model of food production, yet this platform proves to be a diversified agricultural system. An adequate diversity in a food system benefits health and society to a great extent. India is a country with agroclimatic diversity and hence has developed social food security systems.

Diversification in horticulture in non-traditional areas.
Exploring and utilizing the diversity of horticultural crops having enormous therapeutic and nutraceutical values.

Summit Themes

The Summit will focus on the following themes:

- Organic and natural horticultural production.
- Climate-resilient horticultural technologies for sustainable development.
- Diversification in horticulture in non-traditional areas.
- Exploring and utilizing the diversity of horticultural crops having enormous therapeutic and nutraceutical values.

Participants

The Summit is open to all horticulturists interested in Horticultural Research and Development, professionals, researchers, students, entrepreneurs, policy-makers, etc. In short, and realize their expectations of knowledge and new developments in the field.

Advances in production technologies: Horticultural crops: Post-biomanagement of plant production practices (including yield potential, quality and post harvest treatment), climate-smart agriculture, precision agriculture, and protected cultivation, etc.

- Current Horticulture
